VALLEY OF HEART’S DELIGHT: From Orchards to Suburbs in Santa Clara Valley

To promote the Santa Clara Valley as an idyllic place to live and to visit in the early 1920s, the San José Chamber of Commerce coined the slogan, “Valley of Heart’s Delight.” In 1922 there were 80,000 acres of prune orchards in the Santa Clara Valley. By 1997 fewer than 400 acres remained. Today, apart from longtime residents, few people living in the Valley are aware of this urban region’s past as the Valley of Heart’s Delight. The Valley has shifted from a world-renowned center of food production to a world-renowned center of technology. “Silicon Valley” is the Chamber’s new slogan.

How did the Valley of Heart’s Delight evolve into the Silicon Valley? The entire story cannot be told in a single gallery, but themes central to understanding the transformation are presented. Two types of images are woven throughout the exhibit: panoramic photographs and digital collages. Early artists such as Andrew Putnam Hill documented the Valley as it appeared in the 1890s using a panoramic camera. These spectacular panoramas are shown together for the first time.

Like Hill a hundred years before, artist Christie Santos also documented the Valley, but using a very different technique. Starting with her own mother, Santos interviewed both longtime residents and newcomers, asking each to write a page or two about their experiences living in the Santa Clara Valley. She then gathered photographs from these individuals and from local historic archives and combined them to create digital collages. The result is a

According to The American Heritage Dictionary, a friend is “one who supports, sympathizes with, or patronizes a group, cause, or movement.” By this definition (or any other) Glenn George was the greatest friend any person or organization in San José could have. He certainly was a special friend of History San José, and he will be missed.

Glenn George died on April 25th, at the age of 70. He was one of San José’s most honored and respected philanthropists, whose life and generosity spanned the transformation of the Valley of Hearts Delight to Silicon Valley. He ran a wholesale liquor business that he inherited from his father. But Glenn’s great community legacy was established in his work for Hope Rehabilitation Services, Red Cross, Camp Fire Girls, Boy Scouts, the American Heart Association, and the Diabetes Society, among others.

In the past two years, Glenn became an active leader behind the scenes for History San José. As a community member of the board resources committee, he identified and recruited new leadership. He contributed the new display cases in the exhibit gallery and helped kick off the new History Makers programs in the fall of 2000. He identified and solicited new donors. He gave generously.

And he always did everything with a style and joie de vivre that was unique to Glenn. “He bought the museum a golf cart to use for events,” recalls CEO David Crosson. “He said that we could use it for anything, as long as I didn’t drive it.” That was classic Glenn George.

According to board chair Steve Cox, “The most important thing Glenn did for History San José was to introduce us—and in some cases re-introduce us—to the many of the community’s long-time leaders.” His influence on the transformation and future of History San José will be felt for years to come.

But, according to Crosson, “The most important thing about Glenn George was how he made everyone he touched feel that, for that moment, he or she was the single most important person in his life. That is a very special gift. And for that, more than anything else, he will be missed.”

Exciting Partnership

At History San José we are developing new ways to tell the stories which will build bridges among the diverse cultures of our community. We are proud of the many ways in which we accomplish this, including new exhibits, new and updated education programs, reinterpretation of the structures at History Park and new partnerships with organizations that will bring vital programming and energy to HSJ.

Now, we are involved in an exciting collaboration which has increased the use of the History Park site and provided an important community service: Partnership with Camp Fire Boys and Girls for a summer camp program—which eventually will expand into an after school program to serve the neighborhood children.

Summer Day Camp

History Park hosted a low-cost day camp between June and August 2001 for Camp Fire Boys and Girls. This nine-week activity had the county-wide advantages of being lower-than-average cost, longer-than-average daily hours (7 a.m.–6 p.m.), and was available on a week-by-week as-needed basis. Professional and trained volunteer counselors led 7-11 year-olds in themed activities, outdoor exercises, and reading skills.

This summer camp was made possible in part by a grant from the City of San José’s Healthy Neighborhood Venture Fund, as well as the collaborative efforts of History San José and Camp Fire.
German immigrant and businessman, who followed a deeper inner creed, and allowed the Chinese to live and work on his land, Heinlenville and Yu's family survival would not have been possible.

Chan talked about the Chinese Exclusionary Act, which among many things, prohibited the Chinese from growing crops. Surprisingly, the only flower not considered a crop during the 1940s-50s was a chrysanthemum. That is why so many Chinese Americans became successful mum growers and when allowed, later became prosperous nursery owners.

Chang, a recent immigrant from Taiwan, spoke about the "need for Chinese Americans to stand tall," and to "get involved." As a college professor, Chang tells his students that "these are good times we are living in." He's quick to point out that we have a long way to go toward ending racial inequities, but also seems sincere about recognizing how far society has come. Admittedly, Chang was upset by the recent poll that said many Americans don't "trust" Chinese Americans. But for Chang, Cupertino's mayor and an active community leader, getting involved is the only answer to change.

Discussion ensued around close friends—economic cycles and discrimination. All panelists had personal stories of discrimination. Chan and Yu agreed that economic downturns are often closely related to increased racial offenses. Chang, mildly disagreed, asking the audience if racism went away during this prolonged period of economic boom? "Unfortunately, you can't legislate attitudes," said Chang. "We are a society that is still recovering," he added.

All three spoke of the importance to learn about, and from one another, and to experience different cultures. In jaded Silicon Valley terms the outcome might be to increase business opportunities—but for these informed speakers—understanding one another is a goal unto itself.

Following the program was a book signing by Connie Young Yu and a reception with light refreshments, sponsored by the Chinese Historical and Cultural Project.

Exhibit: Valley of Hearts Delight
History Park, Pacific Hotel Gallery
Valley of Hearts Delight is an exhibition focusing on Santa Clara Valley’s agricultural history. The exhibition features the digital artwork of Christie Santos. Santos interviewed her mother, and her mother’s friends, who worked in the fruit industry as part of a project to earn her BFA at San José State. The result is a body of work that exemplifies an experience shared by many, and at the same time allows people unfamiliar with this history to share in a very personal vision. The exhibit will also include historic photographs and artifacts from History San José’s permanent collection, such as the amazing panorama photographs by local artist Andrew Putnam Hill. Contemporary documentary photography by Gabriel Ibarra and Sarah Puckett will show what is now located on land that used to be dedicated to fruit production.

Drs. Chuck Darrah and Jan English-Lueck, professors of Anthropology at San Jose State University, have been studying the cultures of Silicon Valley for the last decade in what will ultimately be a fifteen-year project. They have found that Silicon Valley is not only a site for technical innovation, but also social experimentation and innovation. Their ethnographic fieldwork is the basis of the forthcoming books, Cultures @ Silicon Valley and Remaking Everyday Life.

Breaking The Rock: The Great Escape From Alcatraz
Friday September 28th; 7:30-8:30pm
On June 11, 1962, after months of digging through concrete, stealing supplies to make life vests and a raft, four convicts broke “the rock.” Three of them were never seen again. How did they do it? Who helped them? Join author Jolene Babyak as she investigates and exposes the searing story of how the most famous escape attempt in U.S. History caused the prison to be abandoned nine months later.
President McKinley Comes to San Jose

It was just 100 years ago that the citizens of Santa Clara Valley played host to their nation’s president. Three days in May (the 13th to the 15th, 1901) were set aside to celebrate the arrival of President and Mrs. William McKinley in a lavish festival that made all previous San Jose events pale by comparison. Presidential visits were rare in those days, particularly in the Far West. This was not to be just a whistle stop. McKinley had planned to spend several nights in San Jose, but circumstances made his stay shorter than expected.

William McKinley, the 25th President, had just won a second term when he decided to tour the nation by train, making speeches along the way to promote his new trade policies. Having weathered the Spanish American War during his first term both he and our nation were beginning the new century in an era of optimism. Traveling with his wife Ida and members of his cabinet, including his Secretary of State, John Hay, the President was greeted by crowds as he swept through the South and Southwest. Traveling ahead of him was a party of Ohioans (McKinley was from Ohio) and their governor. In Los Angeles the McKinley party was met with an extended grand fiesta.

Not to be outdone by Los Angeles the social elite of San Jose and surrounding towns spent months planning an all day rose parade and festival which was to be followed by a fancy ball. The visit could not have been better timed, for the roses and flowers of the Garden City were in full display.

Rose Carnival
The presidential train was met by a long line of horse and buggies, and the guests were transported to St. James Park. The reviewing platform was in the park facing the stately courthouse. From here the President was greeted by Mayor Charles Martin and other local dignitaries including Stanford President David Star Jordan, the presidents of Santa Clara College, San Jose State Normal and the College of the Pacific, the Hayes brothers and numerous other prominent business men.

Mrs. E.O. Smith, the grand dame of local society presented the President with a bouquet of roses made up of contributions of 2,000 Santa Clara Valley ladies. This floral arrangement was in the shape of a Christmas tree that stood over twenty feet in height. After the speeches the visitors were treated to an early version of the Pasadena Rose Parade. Dozens of flowered bedecked wagons and buggies, marching bands and costumed equestrians paraded down North First Street. A photo collection of this event was presented to the departing President by Amaury Mars, and it was subsequently published in his book: Reminiscences of Santa Clara Valley and San Jose, California. (Reprinted in 1976 by Leonard McKay.)

The evening’s grand ball was held in San Jose’s ornate Vendome Hotel, but an unfortunate circumstance would deprive the local elite of the opportunity to socialize with their President. Mrs. McKinley had become seriously ill from an infected finger which caused swelling and a high fever. She had been rushed to San Francisco earlier in the day, and physicians there thought that she might die. Knowing this, the President must have been sorely distracted during the day’s festivities. He tendered his regrets prior to the ball and left for San Francisco to be with his wife.

Secretary of State John Hay and other officials representing the President remained however, so the party was still a great success. Fortunately Ida McKinley recovered (worried aides were preparing a funeral train) and the President followed through with his plans which included launching the Battleship Ohio from San Francisco’s Union Iron Works.

The President Shot
President McKinley returned to Washington in triumph. The nation warmed to this here-to-fore austere politician when they learned how he steadfastly carried on during his wife’s illness. The citizens of Santa Clara Valley were still basking in the afterglow when news reached them on September 5th that McKinley had been fatally wounded by an assassin’s bullet while attending the Pan American Exposition at Buffalo, New York. No doubt the people of our Valley felt the death of their President more deeply than most after just having had him in their midst.

1901, and a service was held in St. James Park where, only months earlier, the President had spoken. The Reverend Robert E. Kenna, President of Santa Clara College, gave the address, and hymns were sung to the accompaniment of a military band.

A Lasting Memorial
Perhaps the enthusiasm and cooperation displayed by the many who had prepared the welcoming event carried over into their efforts to memorialize the event and the man. A committee was formed for such a purpose.

Rupert Schmid was commissioned to sculpt the larger than life figure of McKinley in his studio at 382 West San Fernando Street. It was discovered that no foundry on the west coast could handle so large an order, so the casting was done by the Henry Bonnard Company in New York. The large stone base came from local contractors. The cost totaled $13,500, a great deal for a small town to raise by subscription, but the Women’s Committee of 100 donated $3,600 which put them over the top.

The impressive memorial to President McKinley was unveiled in St. James Park on February 21, 1903 with a ceremony described by the Mercury Herald as “simple and fitting.” The site was precisely where McKinley had delivered his address less that two years before. Once again the crowds gathered to honor the President who had found time to stop in San Jose.
